Incident Details	Warnings / Lessons Learned
Crewmate fingers caught in the closing door, bruising and swelling ensued, and trephination prescribed.
Crewmate assisting on deck became dizzy and had blurred vision. Crew helped him to the conference room/sick bay. The MPIC assessed the patient and called a professional since the symptoms were similar to a stroke. The patient later said they sometimes get sudden migraines with these symptoms. Typically onset with lack of sleep and or stress. The patient was put on bed rest and the ship returned to port to put them ashore for further assessment from their doctor.	It is a common problem for science teams to overexert themselves or overwork during the days prior to a cruise and performing a complicated mob. It is difficult for the ship's crew to monitor science work time closely. Should there be a 12-hour max workday requirement for science as there is for ship's crew? Could be exceeded case by case with a risk mitigation plan.
